Grimes' reference to a report card is relevant, since what we're discussing today is the instruction in grand themes and "great books" represented by W.H. Auden's syllabus above for his English 135, "Fate and the Individual in European Literature." Granted, this is not an intro lit class (although I imagine that his intro class may have been punishing as well), but a course for ...

Everyone knows suffering, that state of acute pain which dominates our attention and reigns over our motivation, but W.H. Auden, in his poem "Musée des Beaux Arts," observes how poorly many of us understand the human position of suffering, how far too often someone else's suffering receives as relief little more than a back that's leisurely turned away or a blind eye.
