'You don't want to know', with precisely the same meaning is equally acceptable. It is a punchier variant, probably preferred in the US for that reason. 'You don't want to know' is being used to represent 'Even though you have a desire to know as evidenced by your asking the question, if I give you the facts, you'll wish you never asked.'

meaning - "You wouldn't want to know" vs "you don't want ...

This is entirely legal, so long as the protestors have the right permits and things don't turn violent. However, many veteran protestors will tell you there's more going on behind the scenes. Most protestors, they argue, don't want things to devolve into physical conflict.
